

I kept the content, visual identity and images of my portfolio consistent while I was building and improving the website. I used the same fonts, colour palette, spacing and overall style across the Home, Work, About, Contact and project pages. I also structured the website so a user can understand who I am first, view my work and individual projects, and then contact me if they want to connect.

While working on the portfolio, I also realised that the design itself should not take attention away from my projects. I used actual screenshots of my work where possible instead of relying on generated images to represent the projects. For the rest of the website, I kept the images and colours within a similar visual style so the pages still felt connected. I avoided adding too many colours, fonts or decorative elements since I wanted the projects themselves to stand out.

Since I completed this assignment after working through some of the later portfolio assignments, a lot of these decisions have already been applied to the live website. The portfolio has developed further with more detailed project case studies, a working contact form, deployment on Vercel and a plan for adding future projects. Working on it over time helped me understand that consistency is not just about choosing a colour palette or font at the beginning, but making sure those same decisions continue to work as the website grows.
